

Health Care Law

Overview

McDowell Rice's health care group provides strategic planning and representation in federal, state and local forums among physicians and health care institutions, including mental health care providers, both for-profit and non-profit, in the rapidly evolving health care industry. We have decades of expertise in representing clients in contract, regulatory, insurance, reimbursement and administrative matters. Our lawyers have extensive experience advising clients on how to avoid and economically resolve disputes and health care law related problems. Clients include physicians, practice groups, nursing homes, adult day programs, supported living providers, special education and mental health non-profits, and others who provide health care and mental health care services in the 21st century.

When problems arise, McDowell Rice's health care attorneys represent clients in contested matters before state boards, peer review groups, arbitration panels, administrative tribunals, and state and federal courts.

Representative actions include:

Nursing Home Representation

HIPAA compliance

Regulatory compliance

Medical staff privilege hearings

Licensing and Credentialing matters

Office issues such as patient billing, information systems, insurance matters, and contracts

Patient discharge appeals and due process hearings

Practice group combinations and separations

Negotiation of contracts with governmental entities for health, mental health and residential services

Whether providing litigation avoidance services or litigation representation, the firm's experienced attorneys work with medical professionals to protect and support their clients' rights.
